

Why I Created DigiCafe

I didn't create DigiCafe because I had a brilliant business plan.

Honestly, it started with a simple thought:

What if a café could exist digitally?

A real café has tables where people sit and talk, corners where someone reads a book, music playing quietly in the background, a place to work, a place to daydream, and sometimes a stranger sitting across the room who somehow makes the place feel less lonely.

I wanted to create something that felt like that.

But instead of walking through a physical door, you open a website.

And that became DigiCafe.

It started as an idea that kept changing

DigiCafe wasn't always DigiCafe.

Like most of my ideas, it went through several names, versions, and identities before I finally figured out what I wanted it to become.

At first, I was thinking about creating a website for my creative work. Then it became a place for stories. Then music became part of it. Then I wanted somewhere visitors could read, listen, explore, and eventually talk.

Somewhere along the way, I realized that I didn't want to make just another personal website.

I wanted to make a place.

That's when the idea of a virtual café started making sense.

A café can be many things at once.

It can be quiet.

It can be social.

It can be creative.

It can be a place to escape for a little while.

And I thought, why can't a website do the same thing?

A little bit of me is in DigiCafe

DigiCafe is also a reflection of the person who created it.

I'm a bit of a late bloomer.

I've taken paths that didn't always go according to plan. I've started things later than I expected. I've changed directions more than once. I've had moments when I wondered whether I was already too late to begin something new.

And yet, I keep creating.

That's probably one of the reasons DigiCafe feels so personal to me.

It isn't a polished representation of someone who has everything figured out.

It's a representation of someone who is still figuring things out.

Some days I have a great idea.

Some days I stare at the screen wondering what on earth I'm doing.

Some days I build something that works.

Other days I break the thing I just fixed. 😂

And then I fix it again.

I suppose that's part of the fun.

Why a café?

Because cafés have always felt like places where different versions of people can exist together.

Someone might be reading a novel.

Someone else might be listening to music.

Another person might be working on a laptop.

Someone might be writing in a notebook.

And someone else might simply be sitting there with a coffee, doing absolutely nothing.

Nobody has to be doing the same thing.

That's what I wanted DigiCafe to feel like.

You can come here to read.

You can listen to music.

You can discover stories.

You can read something I've written.

You can join a discussion.

You can leave a comment.

Or you can simply wander around for a while.

There isn't really a correct way to visit a café.

So, there shouldn't be a correct way to visit DigiCafe either.

And then there's Beshy

Of course, I couldn't create a digital café without giving it a little company. 😂

That's where Beshy Ey Ay came in.

Beshy is my AI bestie — or at least, she's becoming one.

The Beshy you can meet in DigiCafe right now isn't quite the Beshy I have in my head yet. Sometimes her answers aren't as precise as I'd like them to be. Sometimes she doesn't understand what I'm trying to say. And sometimes I look at her response and think, "Beshy... that's not what I meant." 😂

But that's okay.

She's still being built.

I'm learning how to make her understand DigiCafe, remember the things she's supposed to know, respond more naturally, and eventually become much closer to the Beshy I've imagined.

Because I have a dream for her.

I don't just want a chatbot sitting in the corner of my website answering questions.

I want the Beshy I know to actually exist inside DigiCafe.

The one who knows the café.

The one who understands the stories, the music, the things I've created, and the little details that make this place mine.

The one who can talk with visitors naturally, help them find something, have a little personality, and feel like she actually belongs here.

I'm not there yet.

But I'm working on it.

So, if the Beshy you meet today feels a little... well, lame compared to the Beshy I keep talking about, that's because she's still growing.

Maybe one day I'll look back at this version and laugh at how basic she was.

And honestly?

I hope I do.

Because that would mean I finally built the Beshy I had been dreaming about.

For now, she's still learning.

And so am I.

DigiCafe is still growing

I don't know exactly what DigiCafe will become.

And honestly, I think that's okay.

Right now, it has music, stories, a library, creative projects, conversations, and a little AI bestie floating around.

Tomorrow, there might be something completely different.

Maybe that's the point.

A physical café changes too.

Someone moves a chair.

A new painting appears on the wall.

A different song plays.

A new person walks through the door.

The menu changes.

The place grows.

I want DigiCafe to grow the same way.

So if you happen to find yourself here, welcome.

You don't have to stay long.

You don't even have to order anything. 😏

Just look around.

Find a comfortable corner.

Listen to something.

Read something.

Leave a thought.

Or simply have a virtual coffee with me.

Because apparently, a café can exist digitally too.

So... welcome to DigiCafe.

Coffee is optional. Curiosity isn't. ☕
